In compiling this collection no pains were spared to gather those that were first favorites. Those songs and poems that did not win popularity in the time of the civil war have been rigidly discarded, whatever their merit. Those which are identified with the high tide of American patriotism are here included and it is believed that in this respect this is the most complete collection ever published. There is not a song or verse here but the soldiers heart and the hearts of patient watchers at home have been thrilled to the depths on unnumbered fields and in countless homes. And to preserve the complete circle of association, the most notable of the cries of defiance have also been retained, Dixie, and Maryland, for example. In no other way can...
