Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: . . . scene in which he is introduced to us gives us ducJf0TMtous. but a glimpse of him, and for a time he passes back into the secrecy of his simple life; changed, indeed, because of the great thoughts which were stirred in him, and because already he felt in some degree the burden of coming responsibilities. Samuel was directed to fill his horn with the con-His anointing. secrating oil, which was used for the anointing of priests, prophets, and kings, and go to Bethlehem, where the future king of Israel would be pointed out to him. On a pretext of sacrifice, possibly, as a tradition suggests, as cleansing away some sin committed in the district, and so disguising the real significance of his errand, Samuel went to Bethlehem. Before the feast began, which usually followed such sacrifices, he waited to execute his higher mission. Sam. ix. J3,...
